Iran's June 12th Election and After: Society, Gender, and Technology

Panel Discussion

This past summer, Iran's 2009 contested presidential election caused massive post-election protests, which were broadcast all over the world. Three dimensions of these events will be discussed: aspects of the social movement called the "Green Movement; women's role in the Green Movement; and the role of media via citizen reporting and other technologies in producing global awareness. Through an examination of these different facets, there can be a more in-depth understanding of Iran's election and post-election events.

Panelists:
